Will more wild be called 'wilderness?'

Groups seeking substantial protection for lands in Gore Range, north of Vail, near Camp Hale and south of Edwards

VAIL — If you're in an area deemed "wilderness," you're in a really special place, said Chuck Ogilby, a longtime Vail resident.

"It makes an area absolutely pristine, and that is such an incredibly rare thing in the world today," he said.

There's plenty of wild land around Eagle County — 85 percent of the county is public land. But that land — including its wildlife and water — can still face threats, whether it's logging, mining or snowmobiles.

Wilderness designation helps protect land from those threats. Three such areas are already in the county: The Eagles Nest Wilderness encompasses the Gore Range, the Holy Cross Wilderness covers more than 100,000 acres around Mount of the Holy Cross, and a small portion of the Flat Tops Wilderness is in the county.

Wilderness areas ban snowmobiles and mountain bikes and limit mining and logging.

Ogilby said he supports the creation of more "wilderness" around Eagle County, and a new campaign is trying to do just that. Three regional groups are eyeing 670,000 acres in the White River National Forest for the "wilderness area" designation. Much of that land is in Eagle County.

"We're kind of surrounded by the sights and sounds of urban life," said Clare Bastable of the Colorado Mountain Club. "The opportunity to get away from our day jobs and vehicles, our urban lives, to be able to get solitude, those opportunities are diminishing as Colorado gets more and more developed.

"Wilderness offers the ultimate opportunity to seek quiet, to seek solitude, to reconnect with nature."

Headed to Congress

The plan, called the Hidden Gems Wilderness Campaign, is now a draft, and the organizers are asking community members for input. The Wilderness Workshop, the Colorado Mountain Club and the Colorado Environmental Coalition are spearheading the campaign.

"We're trying to sit down with those folks and get a sense of how our proposal looks," said Lisa Smith of the Colorado Environmental Coalition.

Once it's completed, the plan will have to get approval from Congress. Sloan Shoemaker, director of the Wilderness Workshop, said the campaign organizers have been talking to the state's congressional delegation, and are optimistic about Congress' willingness to approve new wilderness.

"There might be more openness to wilderness than there has been previously," he said.

But it's important that the effort starts with citizens, Shoemaker said.

"Congress doesn't act on agency recommendations," he said. "They act on the will of the constituents."
